Late occurrences in this city have called the attention of the marriages formed under these incongruities seldom or never are productive of happiness. There are others who, while they think the experiment something of a hazardons one, yet believe that many of the happiest marriages in the world have been

In the story which follows the question is entered upon a: some length, and what are believed to be the faults and vices of society are handled with a faithful and yet a kindly hand. It is and yet, with one or two exceptions, occurring nest the close of the story, every one has been furnished by recollections of roof life within the past ten years, in the City of New-York and its scarcely one of the several instances of such deprecated marriages has occurred among us, in which the feeling which would have produced precisely those results has not been in otherwise tolerably clear in their perceptions as to the affinity which exists between the human heart in what are called the "bigher walks of life" and in humbler and, less pretentious society. Whether late occurrences may not rather precipitate and strengthen the antagonism which has in past time been and size productive of so much misery, is not certain. At all events, the readers of this story may be sure that the revelations of real the readers of this story may be sure that the revenious of real life contained in it are made without antagonistic feelings to-ward one or another class of society, and only in reprobation of the improprieties which have grown like fungi upon them— with a hope that something may be done toward their removal. It may be necessary to say, in conclusion, that the knowledge of many of the facts here embodied has been arrived at through of many connection with certain legal departments, and also through official familiarity with the internal and tre outside working of more than one of the lunatio asylume of our country.
